Galloway, N.J. - The public is invited to an opening reception of "Hammonton: 150 Years of Agriculture," an exhibit that celebrates the town's farming roots, hosted by Stockton University's Kramer Hall instructional site as part of Hammonton's Third Thursday, Sept. 15 from 6 - 8 p.m.

The Noyes Museum of Art of Stockton University has partnered with Stockton University faculty and staff, the South Jersey Culture and History Center, and the Town of Hammonton to present two exhibitions celebrating the town's Sesquicentennial. The newest exhibition highlighting agriculture is now open and will run until Dec. 31.

This exhibition at Kramer Hall, 30 Front St. in downtown Hammonton, showcases artifacts, documents, photographs and artists' interpretations related to the topic of agriculture. The first exhibition highlighted the many industries that were prevalent in Hammonton during the past 150 years.

The opening reception is free and open to the public. Light refreshments will be served.
